questions which crop up every day, and which are being pressed with an earnestness that shows that men increasingly regard political and national questions simply as means to an end, and that that end is the growth of civilization and the distribution of its blessings to the largest number.

Ever since the time of the French Revolution nothing has excited more animadversion among certain classes of social enthusiasts than the inequalities of fortune. That some men should be rich while others are poor seems to them to be an injustice on the face of it, and to prove that there is something wrong with the social machine. It is true that equality never has existed since human society began; nor can any one show how to bring it about or how to maintain it. Nonetheless there is a passionate feeling that it ought to exist, and that only when it does will the perfection of society be attained.

Mr. MAILLICK sets himself to combat this favourite theory, which he contends is not in accordance with any known facts. Civilization, he maintains, is due to human effort, and human effort is the result of human motive. The rudest motive is that of hunger for food, if that alone operated, the race would always be in barbarism. It is precisely in proportion as a higher class of motives comes into operation that the effort necessary to raise the status of humanity is stimulated and sustained. Men do not know their own capabilities till they are stimulated to exertion. Human nature is a reservoir of potencies, and the extent of them is never suspected by barbarian races. With every fresh rise in civilization there is a fresh call upon the capabilities of human effort. A higher ness of desires is satiated, and a vigorous equality of effort is stimulated at the same time. But without inequalities in fortune there would not have been the same amount of desire, and therefore not the same amount of effort. The hunger of the body lies at the basis of all industry; but the hunger of the mind is the basis of the higher industry. The eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor the ear with hearing; and it is the insatiableness of the higher appetites that set men on the way to improving. It is for moralists to determine how far the desire for improved material condition is a good thing; whether it ought to have limits, and, if so, where, and how they are to be determined. But while it comes within the range of human science to say what ought to be, it belongs to the domain of religion to determine whether fact what is, and to point out that but for inequalities in wealth there would not have been the same accumulation; and but for the accumulation, the same amount of people could not subsist so well as they do. The presence of wealth in a community is like the developing solution poured over a photograph. It develops human nature; it develops all the sleeping talents, energies, ambitions, ingenuities, by which man is distinguished from the animals, and by the degrees of which men are distinguished from each other. It seems to be producing inequalities, but it is really only revealing them."

All men desire wealth, but then they do not all desire it with the same dominance over other desires. The man who earns try drinking a week, and spends thirty dollars a day, desires wealth, but his desire is not strong enough to overcome his immediate and minimal appetite. All wealth begins in labour, but labour alone would not produce it. There must be superadded self-denial, and the power of postponing immediate indulgence in the hope of future advantage. This moral quality must combine with the physical effort, or wealth can never make a beginning. If the product of labour is consumed as soon as it is created, there can be no accumulation. But the moral faculty differs greatly in different people, and social development not only reveals these inequalities, but it has the effect also of enlarging the extent to which the mere desire becomes operative. In the very low stage of civilization there is not is much to quicken desire and hope as there is in a higher stage. There is not so much to stimulate ambition, not the same variety of artificial desires. Missionaries in dealing with South Sea Islanders have laboured to multiply the wishes of the people for the good things of life, feeling that only in that way can the natural tendency to indolence be corrected, and the fitful efforts of savage life be exchanged for the steady trained industry of a civilized condition. "A human being may be looked upon as a kind of magnetism engine, worked by desire and hope, which magnetism is maintained by its own periodical fall and excitement, and the amount of work that can be done by it is proportionate to the desire and hope with which its magnets can be charged." The presence of inequalities in society has the

In commenting, some time back, upon President ARTHUR's message to Congress, we noticed with gratification the reference it contained to the question of Civil Service reform, and the practical admission of the superiority of the English system of appointment, promotion, and general management to that now in force in the United States. That this is not an exaggerated representation of the effect of the PRESIDENT's remarks, will appear from the fact that he declared in some few words his sense of obligation to approve to a law which should incorporate an essential feature of the English system, although I doubted the expediency of an attempt to adopt immediately, and apply extensively, a scheme that should merely embody some of those features to the exclusion of others equally important. This expression of opinion was, however, interpreted on the supposition as holding out little promise of support to the cause of reform, and, indeed, indicating a disposition to submit to a little sacrifice of the programme of the reformers. The critics apparently divided between the lines, and took the President to have professed his willingness to assent to a scheme which was not likely to be submitted to for the purpose of catering his opposition to one which had actually been formulated. An

Secretary, briefly summarises a bill which had been unanimously reported to the Senate by the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service before the date of the President's message. The chief points are as follows:—Recognition of prior claims of soldiers and sailors; open competitive examination for testing the capacity of applicants; appointments to be made by selection from among applicants graded highest at such examinations; the public service to be graded, and original entrance to with an estimated area of about 100,000 acres of good grazing land, and an open water-free flat, with a new building supply of water even in the driest seasons, it runs being watered by the Borough, Yarrabingha, Tingahilly, Boreah, Boreah, Coobergherry, and Coobergherry Creeks, in fact, permanently watered in all seasons.

All men desire wealth, but then they do not all desire it with the same dominance over other desires. The man who earns fifty shillings a week, and spends thirty in drink, desires wealth, but his desire is not strong enough to overcome his immediate, minimal appetite. All wealth begins in labour, but labour alone would not produce it. There must be superadded self-denial, and the power of postponing immediate indulgence in the hope of future advantage. The presence of inequalities in society has the effect of charging these magnets, and for that reason it lies at the basis of a vast amount of human activity. Those who would take away the motive by an enforced equality will have to find another to substitute for it.

THE ARAKO WAMIE STATION.

The country consists of bush and apple trees, with some ironbark and pine. There are flats extending for miles with numerous small creeks and open water-free flats.

It is described as being good and all stock thrives well on it.

On the morning of 1871, 22,500 sheep were transported on 1000 runs and did well.

The improvements consist of a five-centred verandah Cottage with detached kitchen, and glass paned doors, and a four split-rail horse and cultivation paddocks. There is an out-station six miles further up Bora Creek, consisting of three rooms.

With the station will be sold—5000 acres. Riverina height, to lamb about the end of November 60 cows
2 saddle horses
1 draft horse
Spring-catt, harness, and all good station tools will be given in exchange for timber grown on the runs which would therefore be cheaply secured.
